

Organization of the Civil War Armies

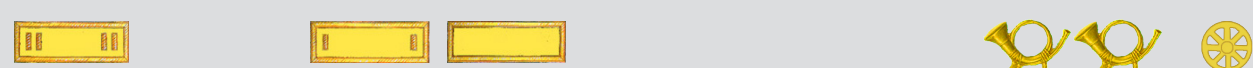

Company: 100 men

82 Privates

13 non-commissioned officers: 1 First Sergeant, 4 Sergeants, 8 Corporals

Commanded by: A Captain 2 other commissioned staff: 1 First Lieutenant, 1 Second Lieutenant 3 support staff: 2 musicians, 1 wagoner

Regiment: 850 to 1,100 men

10 companies (each with the complement listed above)

4 additional non-commissioned officers: 1 Sergeant Major, 1 Quartermaster Sergeant, 1 Ordinance Sergeant, 1 Commissary Sergeant

9 additional support staff: 1 Adjutant, 1 Quartermaster, 1 Surgeon with 2 Assistant Surgeons and a Hospital Steward, 1 Chaplain, 2 Musicians

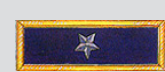

Commanded by: A Colonel 2 other commissioned staff: 1 Lieutenant Colonel, 1 Major

Brigade: 5,000 men

5 regiments (each with the complement listed above)

Commanded by: A Brigadier General

Division: 15,000 men

3 brigades, or 15 regiments (each with the complement listed above)

Commanded by: A Major General

Corps: 45,000 men

3 divisions, or 45 regiments (each with the complement listed above)

Commanded by: A Major General (Union) or a Lieutenant General (Confederacy)

Notes:

1. Configurations shown are most typical; there was considerable variation depending on year, location, troop strength, type of unit, etc.
2. Rank insignias shown are Union. Confederate enlisted insignias tended to be fairly similar; officer insignias were quite different.
3. Supporting roles—Adjutant, Quartermaster, Surgeon, Assistant Surgeon, etc.—were associated with a variety of ranks, as low as Second Lieutenant, and as high as Colonel. In some cases, these tasks were performed by civilian volunteers, who held no military rank at all. Similarly, musicians, wagoners, and chaplains generally did not have a military rank.
4. The Union did not adopt the rank of Lieutenant General (3 stars) until 1864, and then only awarded it to Supreme Commander Ulysses S. Grant. The rough equivalent rank in the Confederate Armies was General (4 stars), held by seven men (Samuel Cooper, Albert Sidney Johnston, Robert E. Lee, Joseph E. Johnston, P.G.T. Beauregard, Braxton Bragg, Edmund Kirby Smith). After the Civil War ended, three men were appointed to 4-star rank in the U.S. Army in succession—Ulysses S. Grant, then William T. Sherman, then Philip Sheridan—and given the title “General of the Armies.” Today, that title is regarded as a 5-star rank, and the U.S. Army generally groups Grant/Sherman/Sheridan with the one man who held 5-star rank during World War I (John Pershing) and the five men who held 5-star rank during and after World War II (George Marshall, Douglas MacArthur, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Henry H. Arnold, and Omar Bradley).